OUR VILLAGE STORY

Washingtonville was first settled in 1731. Growth was slow for the next seventy-five years. In 1809, John Jaques, a boot and shoemaker, set up his shop in this tiny settlement of nine houses then known as Little York. Jaques would later establish's Oldest Winery in 1839.

Samuel Moffat, III built a trading post on the village square in 1811 at the junction of New Windsor and Blooming Grove Turnpike with the Goshen Road. The hamlet began to prosper with a tannery, grist and plaster mills. A hotel was needed and Samuel built his Washington Tavern in 1818. The same year, Samuel and John Jaques bestowed the village with a new name, Wahingtonville, in honor of the late general and first president of the United States.

Samuel Moffat's grandson, David Halliday Moffat, Jr. was born in the family mansion on West Main Street on July 23, 1839. He was destined to be the foremost banker and benefactor of Denver, Colorado. David owned many gold mines, built several railroads and presented his hometown with its magnificent Moffat Library building in 1887 on the site of his birthplace.

Washingtonville grew after the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railway built its branch through the village in 1850. Incorporated in 1895, the village had become an important dairying center with two creameries, Borden's and the Farmers' cooperative. Markets, groceries, a bank, feed and lumber dealers, wagon shops, furniture makers and a hub shop prospered. Its greatest growth occurred in the seventh and eighth decades of this century.
